Arizona Highways, September 1986 (Geronimo; Howard Terpning Art) (Vol. 62, No. 9)

September 1986 marked the centennial of the end of the Apache wars of the American Southwest -- specifically, the last surrender of Geronimo, the scarred, proud old warrior whose military skill and endurance had frustrated the United States and Mexican armies for years. This issue of the state's highly-regarded magazine Arizona Highways observed the event with essays by two noted historians. C. L. Sonnichsen's 7-page biography is illustrated with old photos and new artwork. Jay J. Wagoner, in 10 pages of text and photos, examines Geronimo's military campaigns and tactics. Meanwhile, editor Merrill Windsor reports on the connection with famous artist Allan Houser, whose father fought in Geronimo's band. Color artwork illustrating this issue includes the cover oil painting commissioned by the magazine, by Howard Terpning; another 2-page spread of a Terpning oil; and several other Terpning works, including the back cover "Entering Apache Stronghold." Also "Apache Village at Peace," an oil by Bill Ahrendt; and a photograph of Houser's limited-edition bronze bust of Geronimo. Many of the early C. S. Fly photographs of Geronimo are reproduced. Southeastern Arizona, the original homeland of Geronimo's Chiricahua Apaches, is the focus of the other articles in the magazine. Lynda Sanchez writes about "The Lost Apaches of the Sierra Madre." Jean Gillette, in "Brass Button Brides," describes the lives of frontier soldier wives. The border towns of Douglas and Agua Prieta are profiled, in text and photos. Sam Negri visits the Cochise County village and birdwatching mecca of Portal, Arizona. Budge Ruffner's Bookshelf provides a page of brief reviews, including several books about Geronimo.
