"I ask her what color the leaves on the trees are, and I get the answer, "Leaves?" I ask again and again she says, "Leaves?" And this can repeat many times. I walk her up to a tree (I have a rose bush at home) and say, "Well, come on, what color are they?" She'll think a bit and answer, "Green." And there's no end to this kind of scenario. To this day she calls boots shoes, no matter how I try to drum it into her. I don't think she even understands the question, "Do you understand me?" Long story short – a disaster. She's always distracted. Starts howling at the slightest provocation. Gets terribly insulted. And she'll just collapse on the floor if she has the tiniest little pain, howling again. Yesterday they were taking blood from her finger and she screamed bloody murder so loud everyone on the whole floor could hear her! If we wash her, she freaks out at every touch. She whines about everything. She'll barely bump herself and then start yelling. And it's such obnoxious yelling, and her face is all distorted. In other words, it's a real circus. Sometimes we'll have quiet days, but more often than not, it's war. And my nerves have destroyed my health. I ran around to the doctors – I was frightened. I was having persistent heart pains and headaches. It ended up that my iron levels declined sharply and they diagnosed me with anemia and rheumatoid arthritis. I'd never experienced anything like that in my life."

You've just read an extract from one of these stories where adoptive parents struggle to raise and deal with their adoptive children. This question I would like to ask everyone who is considering in adopting children: Are you ready for maybe inadequate behavior from your future adoptive children? Are you ready for the fact that the love for those children will not appear until later or maybe not at all, that they will remain "strangers" in your family?

Anyway I hope that this book will become very useful for those, who already have adoptive children, or those who are planning to adopt.
