Mirrors of Time: A Poetry Anthology of Science and History for Past and Future Keith Allan Jones

This poetry anthology is an accumulation of many poems that won awards from the late 1970's till today. It covers many styles from the classical sonnets of Britain, across till today with the many modern styles including free verse and haiku. This particular anthology is most interesting as it is also to reflect both emerging ideas related to the theories of Einstein and Hawking among others, but to also reflect the many philosophical and political changes of the past generation. It also provides a good introduction for study of many poetic and literary styles that have emerged not only over the past two centuries of English and American literature, but especially as they are relevant to the past two decades, for to link the past two centuries to recent English literature. More importantly, it has many references from the original poetry published in the 1970's with updates of many new original poems from the past 3 decades that include references to newer updates in science and understanding from both psychology and physics including changes in the Freudian and other clinical methods, as well as the transition from Freud to Hawkings and others to better understand cosmology and astrophysics.
