Sometimes a man needs to listen to his wife when she says watch your back. Other times hindsight is better than foresight. Tallis is a Decanus in the Army of Herod Antipas. He and the soldiers he leads find themselves under attack by Zealots invading Hammath. Now he has three choices, defeat the enemy, face discharge from the service, or death.

Tallis is half Greek and half Jew. As the insurrections increase, his wife, Abigail, mother, Odelia, and brothers call on him to trust in God. But which ones? The gods of his father, or the one true God, the God of Israel.

Will Tallis defeat the Zealots, lose his job, and possibly his life, or will he learn to trust the God he learned about from his mother and in synagogue school. Will he find peace for soul and receive the promotion of his dreams? Perhaps there is more going on than he expects.

Later the attacks on the village of Hammath intensify and Tallis and his troops cannot stop the attacks by zealots in their efforts to have Caesar force Antipas from power before they attempt to drive Rome from Palestine. As Tallis struggles with the murders of two soldiers and the desertion of new recruits, he learns that his brothers may have sympathies with the insurrectionists. With the added pressure, Tallis begins to wonder if God is watching out for him, or was his late father right when he said, "Every time something happens, man invents a god to explain the situation. Should the same event repeat itself, then it's god's fault." Will Tallis believe what his father told him, or follow his mother and wife's advice and seek the one true God, the God of Israel.
